

Overcoming Corporate Social Responsibility's "Washiness"

and Making it a Business Priority

John Waddock, David A. Crane, and David B. Crane

Abstract. This article discusses the challenges of making corporate social responsibility (CSR) a business priority. It argues that CSR is often seen as a "washed" activity, one that is easily dismissed as a mere public relations exercise. To overcome this, the article suggests that CSR should be integrated into the core business strategy and operations. This involves a shift in mindset, where CSR is no longer seen as a separate, optional activity, but as an integral part of the business's identity and success. The article also discusses the importance of leadership in driving this change and the need for transparency and accountability in CSR reporting.
