Touching The Serpents Tale:

Czechoslovak Fairy Tales and The Shoemaker's Apron: A Second Book of Czechoslovak Fairy Tales and Folk Tales Parker Fillmore, 1919-01-01

THERE was once an aged king who had an only son. One day he called the prince to him and said, "My dear son, you know that ripe fruit falls in order to make room for other fruit. This my old head is like ripe fruit and soon the sun will no longer shine upon it. Now before I die, I should like to see you happily married. Get you a wife, my son. I would my father that I could please you in this." The prince answered, "But I know of no one who would make you a worthy daughter-in-law." The old king reached into his pocket, drew out a golden key, and handed it to the prince. He said, "Go up into the tower to the very top. There look about you and when you have decided what you like best of all you see, come back and tell me." The prince took the key and at once mounted the tower. He had never before gone to the very top and he had never heard what was there. He went up and up until at last he saw a small iron door in the ceiling. He opened this with the golden key, pushed it back, and entered a large circular hall. The ceiling was blue and silver like the heavens on a bright night when the stars shine, and the floor was covered with a green silken carpet. There were twelve tall windows set in gold frames, and on the crystal glass of each window a beautiful young girl was pictured in glowing colors. Every one of them was a princess with a royal crown upon her head. As the prince looked at them, it seemed to him that each was more lovely than the last, and for the life of him he knew not which was the loveliest. Then they began to move as if alive, and they smiled at the prince and nodded and looked as if they were about to speak. Suddenly the prince noticed that one of the twelve windows was covered with a white curtain. He pulled the curtain aside, and there without any question was the most beautiful princess of them all, clothed in pure white with a silver girdle and a crown of pearls. Her face was deathly pale and sad as the grave. For a long time the prince stood before this picture in utter amazement, and as he looked at it a pain seemed to enter his heart. "This one I want for my bride," he said aloud. "This one and no other." At these words the maiden bowed, flushed like a rose, and then instantly all the pictures disappeared. When the prince told his father what he had seen and which maiden he had chosen, the old king was greatly troubled. "My son," he said, "you did ill to uncover what was covered, and in declaring this your choice, you have exposed yourself to a great danger. This maiden is in the power of a black magician who holds her captive in an iron castle. Of all who have gone to rescue her, not one has ever returned. However, what's done is done, and you have given your word. Go then, try what fortune has in store for you, and may Heaven bring you back safe and sound." So the prince bade his father farewell, mounted his horse, and rode forth to find his bride. His first adventure was to lose his way in a deep forest. He wandered about some time, not knowing where to turn, when suddenly he was hailed from behind with these words: "Hey there, master, wait a minute." He looked around and saw a tall man running toward him. "Take me into your service, master," the tall man said. "If you do, you won't regret it. What is your name?" the prince asked, and what can you do? "People call me Longshanks because I can stretch myself out. I'll show you. Do you see a bird's nest in the top of that tall fir? I'll get it down for you, and not by climbing the tree either So saying he began to stretch out and his body shot up and up until he was as tall as the fir tree He reached over and got the nest and then in a shorter time than it had taken him to stretch out he reduced himself to his natural size You do your trick very well the prince said but just now a bird s nest isn t of much use to me What I need is some one to show me the way out of this forest H m Longshanks said that s an easy enough matter Again he began to stretch himself up and up and up until he was three times as tall as the highest pine in the forest He looked around and said Over there in that direction is the nearest way out Then he made himself small again took the horse by the bridle walked ahead and in a short time they emerged from the forest A broad plain stretched out before them and beyond it they could see tall gray rocks that looked like the walls of a great city and mountains overgrown with forests Longshanks pointed off across the plain and said There master goes a comrade of mine who would be very useful to you You ought to take him into your service too Very well said the prince call him here that I may find out what sort of a fellow he is He is too far away to call Longshanks said He wouldn t hear my voice and if he did he would be a long time in reaching us for he has much to carry I had better step over and get him myself As he said this Longshanks stretched out and out until his head was lost in the clouds He took two or three strides reached his comrade set him on his shoulder and brought him to the prince The new man was heavily built and round as a barrel Who are you the prince asked And what can you do I am called Girth the man said I can widen myself Let me see you do it the prince said Very well master said Girth beginning to puff out I will But take care Ride off into the forest as fast as you can The prince did not understand the warning but he saw that Longshanks was in full flight so he spurred his horse and galloped after him It was just as well he did for in another moment Girth would have crushed both him and his horse so fast did he spread out so huge did he become In a short time he filled the whole plain until it looked as though a mountain had fallen upon it When the plain was entirely covered he stopped expanding heaved a deep breath that shook the forest trees and returned to his natural size You made me run for my life the prince said I tell you I don t meet a fellow like you every day By all means join me They went across the plain and as they neared the rocks they met a man whose eyes were bandaged with a handkerchief Master said Longshanks there is my other comrade Take him into your service too and I can tell you you won t regret the bread he eats Who are you the prince asked And why do you keep your eyes bandaged You can t see where you re going On the contrary master it is just because I see too well that I have to bandage my eyes With bandaged eyes I see as well as other people whose eyes are uncovered When I take the handkerchief off my sight is so keen it goes straight through everything When I look at anything intently it catches fire and if it can t burn it crumbles to pieces On account of my sight I m called Keen He untied the handkerchief turned to one of the rocks opposite and gazed at it with glowing eyes Soon the rock began to crumble and fall to pieces In a few moments it was reduced to a heap of sand In the sand something gleamed like fire Keen picked it up and handed it to the prince It was a lump of pure gold Ha ha said the prince You are a fine fellow and worth more than wages I should be a fool not to take you into my service Since you have such keen eyes look and tell me how much farther it is to the Iron Castle and what is happening there now If you rode there alone Keen answered you might get there within a year but with us to help you you will arrive this very day Our coming is not unexpected either for at this very moment they are preparing supper for us What is the captive princess doing She is sitting in a high tower behind an iron grating The magician stands on guard If you are real men the prince cried you will all help me to free her The three comrades promised they would They led the prince straight through the gray rocks by a defile which Keen made with his eyes and on and on through high mountains and deep forests Whatever obstacle was in the way one or another of the three comrades was able to remove it By late afternoon they had crossed the last mountain had left behind them the last stretch of dark forest and they saw looming up ahead of them the Iron Castle Just as the sun sank the prince and his followers crossed the drawbridge and entered the courtyard gate Instantly the drawbridge lifted and the gate clanged shut They went through the courtyard and the prince put his horse in the stable where he found a place all in readiness Then the four of them marched boldly into the castle Everywhere in the courtyard in the stables and now in the various rooms of the castle they saw great numbers of richly clad men all of whom masters and servants alike had been turned to stone They went on from one room to another until they reached the banquet hall This was brilliantly lighted and the table with food and drink in abundance was set for four persons They waited expecting some one to appear but no one came At last overpowered by hunger they sat down and ate and drank most heartily After supper they began to look about for a place to sleep It was then without warning that the doors burst open and the magician appeared He was a bent old man with a bald head and a gray beard that reached to his knees He was dressed in a long black robe and he had instead of a belt three iron bands about his waist He led in a beautiful lady dressed in white with a silver girdle and a crown of pearls Her face was deathly pale and as sad as the grave The prince recognized her instantly and sprang forward to meet her Before he could speak the magician raised his hand and said I know why you have come It is to carry off this princess Very well take her If you can guard her for three nights so that she won't escape you she is yours But if she escapes you then you and your men will suffer the fate of all those who have come before you and be turned into stone Then when he had motioned the princess to a seat he turned and left the hall The prince could not take his eyes from the princess she was so beautiful He tried to talk to her asking her many questions but she made him no answer She might have been marble the way she never smiled and never looked at any of them He seated himself beside her determined to stay all night on guard in order to prevent her escape For greater security Longshanks stretched himself out on the floor like a strap and wound himself around the room the whole length of the wall Girth sat in the doorway and puffed himself out until he filled that space so completely that not even a mouse could slip through Keen took his place by a pillar in the middle of the hall But alas in a few moments they all grew heavy with drowsiness and in the end slept soundly all night long In the morning in the early dawn the prince awoke and with a pain in his heart that was like a blow from a dagger he saw that the princess was gone Instantly he aroused his men and asked them what was to be done It s all right master don t worry said Keen as he took a long look through the window I see her now A hundred miles from here is a forest in the midst of the forest an ancient oak on the top of the oak an acorn The princess is that acorn Let Longshanks take me on his shoulders and we ll go get her Longshanks picked Keen up stretched himself out and set forth He took ten miles at a stride and in the time it would take you or me to run around a cottage here he was back again with the acorn in his hand He gave it to the prince Drop it master on the floor The prince dropped the acorn and instantly the princess appeared As the sun came over the mountain tops the doors slammed open and the magician entered A crafty smile was on his face But when he saw the princess the smile changed to a scowl he growled in rage and bang one of the iron bands about his waist burst asunder Then he took the princess by the hand and dragged her off That whole day the prince had nothing to do but wander about the castle and look at all the strange and curious things it contained It seemed as if at some one instant all life had been arrested In one hall he saw a prince who had been turned into stone while he was brandishing his sword The sword was still uplifted In another room there was a stone knight who was taken in the act of flight He had stumbled on the threshold but he had not yet fallen A serving man sat under the chimney eating his supper With one hand he was reaching a piece of roast meat to his mouth Days months perhaps years had gone by but the meat had not yet touched his lips There were many others all of them still in whatever position they happened to be when the magician had cried Be ye turned into stone
