

recklessness criminal law

1. A person is guilty of recklessness if he or she is aware of a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the conduct will result in the commission of a crime and that the person consciously disregards the risk.

2. The risk must be of a substantial and unjustifiable nature. A risk is substantial if it is a real and appreciable one. A risk is unjustifiable if it is one that a reasonable person would not take.

3. The person must be aware of the risk. This means that the person must know that there is a risk of the crime occurring. It does not mean that the person must know that the crime will occur.

4. The person must consciously disregard the risk. This means that the person must know that there is a risk of the crime occurring and that the person chooses to ignore the risk.
