

the Middle East will naturally attract most attention. He finds that Communism as an ideology in the area has primary appeal to educated and semi-educated city dwellers, and not to agricultural workers or the poor. These elements join Communism because it offers in their minds a way to pay back the West for setting up Israel and perpetuating certain elements of colonialism. This and not any deep-seated desire for adoption of Soviet-type societies motivates them, and there are few deterrents such as attachment to civil liberties in Arab society to provide the restraint to Communist-inspired united fronts which one finds in the West.

Indian intellectuals are moved to sympathy with the U.S.S.R. for other reasons in the eyes of Gene D. Overstreet. He suggests they favor the Soviet Union over the United States because of the former's lower standard of living which makes it appear to possess a purer, a more "spiritual," technology, one which is more worthy of imitation. If this be true, it is evident how much we Americans have to learn in drafting our information programs for Asia.

For the areas already within the Soviet orbit the authors present similarly arresting ideas. Hannah Arendt suggests that post-Stalin relaxation is due not to pressure from below but because purge policies create prohibitively high costs in human material. She excludes multi-party systems as a possible entering wedge for democratic forces in these areas because of Continental attitudes toward parties. She finds such forces rather in the workers' councils. Zbigniew Brzezinski foresees no real advance of democratic forces in Poland because in his view the Soviet system requires acceptance of the primacy of the U.S.S.R. and the dictatorship of the proletariat as defined by the U.S.S.R. Edward Taborsky sees no liberalization in Czechoslovakia because the rulers need Soviet support to stay in power, and further, as opportunists, rather than Communist enthusiasts like Tito, they have no interest in developing Communism as a living program. He finds that only real believers are innovators.

Symposia provide such varied fare that no review can do justice. Suffice it to say that this book is challenging in presenting sometimes unsuspected elements that make for Soviet success and failure along her frontiers.
