Invisible Hands, Unseen Hearts: A Migrant Carer in Britain David Patterson, 2025-12-18 She left her small Eastern European town with a nursing certificate a borrowed suitcase and a promise to send money home In Britain her job title was simple care worker but nothing about the work or the life around it felt simple at all In this intimate memoir an Eastern European caregiver recounts years spent in English care homes and private houses tending to strangers at the end of their lives She bathes them feeds them changes their dressings and listens to stories no one else has time to hear Between medication schedules and night shifts she discovers fragile unexpected friendships with the elderly people in her care relationships that slowly reshape her understanding of family duty and love Yet outside the bedroom door another story unfolds agency exploitation zero hours contracts casual racism and the quiet stigma of being just a migrant worker She is trusted with Britain's parents and grandparents but rarely treated as a full human being herself Torn between guilt for the family she left behind and attachment to the people she now cares for she lives in a permanent in between not fully at home in either country Told with tenderness honesty and dry humour this memoir gives a voice to those who keep aging societies functioning while remaining almost invisible It is a story for anyone who has ever cared for someone vulnerable questioned what home really means or wondered about the inner lives of the workers behind the uniform
