ABSTRACT

This purpose of this article was to critically assert the contribution of qualitative research in education. The article offers a theoretical exploration of qualitative (qualitative historical background, features, methods and qualitative strengths and weaknesses) and a structural critical analysis on qualitative studies (study purpose, literature review, study design, method, results and discussion, and conclusion). Two qualitative education research paper were selected and analysed with a view to arguing that qualitative research gives more contributions than others. The results of the analysis indicated that qualitative research positively contributes to education research in many ways, including the possibility of direct interaction in gathering the data, and providing in-depth and critical interpretation of meanings.

1. Introduction

Qualitative research is generally known as a major research methodology which focuses on the explanation, decipherment, and interpretation of people's behaviour, feelings, perspectives, or life experiences. Over the last few decades, the interest in employing this methodology has grown considerably. The growing interest in qualitative occurs due to "pluralization of life worlds" which is particularly interrelated to the study of social relation and requires the empirical study of the issue (Flick, 2014). Additionally, the application of the qualitative methodology in social studies grows rapidly due to the belief that quantitative study neglects the respondents' perspectives and experiences (Ary et al., 2013). Qualitative research is regarded as an increasingly useful method to use in various disciplines, such as psychology, health, business and management, sport, nursing, sociology, art and humanities, and education (Holloway & Wheeler, 2013; Myers, 2013; Willig, 2008; Atkinson, 2012; Sherman & Webb, 2004; Camie et al., 2003; Bruce & Berg, 2001; Bogdan & Biklen, 1997).

This paper studies critically two qualitative research reports which will cover (i) their research methodology and (ii) their contribution to study of education. In this paper, there are three main parts. Firstly, an overview on qualitative research will be presented, consisting its brief history (including its underlying theory), definition, essential features, methods, and strengths and weaknesses. Secondly, I will critically analyse chosen qualitative reports by adapting checklist of criteria for evaluating qualitative studies developed by Bromley et al. (2002) as the guideline. According to Bromley et al. (2002), assessment criteria for qualitative should ideally be applied to the entire research cycles, including study objective, literature review, study design, methods, results and interpretations, conclusion and implication. Finally, the paper will explore research contributions made by chosen journals in the field of education.
