Physiological, Molecular, and Genetic Perspectives of Wheat Improvement Shabir H Wani, Amita

Mohan, Gyanendra Pratap Singh, 2020-12-17 World population is growing at an alarming rate and may exceed 9.7 billion by 2050 whereas agricultural productivity has been negatively affected due to yield limiting factors such as biotic and abiotic stresses as a result of global climate change. Wheat is a staple crop for 20% of the world population and its yield needs to be augmented correspondingly in order to satisfy the demands of our increasing world population. Green revolution, the introduction of semi dwarf high yielding wheat varieties along with improved agronomic management practices gave rise to a substantial increase in wheat production and self sufficiency in developing countries that include Mexico, India and other south Asian countries. Since the late 1980s however wheat yield is at a standoff with little fluctuation. The current trend is thus insufficient to meet the demands of an increasing world population. Therefore while conventional breeding has had a great impact on wheat yield with climate change becoming a reality, newer molecular breeding and management tools are needed to meet the goal of improving wheat yield for the future. With the advance in our understanding of the wheat genome and more importantly the role of environmental interactions on productivity, the idea of genomic selection has been proposed to select for multi genic quantitative traits early in the breeding cycle. Accordingly genomic selection may remodel wheat breeding with gain that is predicted to be 3 to 5 times that of crossbreeding. Phenomics, high throughput phenotyping is another fairly recent advancement using contemporary sensors for wheat germplasm screening and as a selection tool. Lastly CRISPR Cas9 ribonucleoprotein mediated genome editing technology has been successfully utilized for efficient and specific genome editing of hexaploid bread wheat. In summary there has been exciting progresses in the development of non GM wheat plants resistant to biotic and abiotic stress and or wheat with improved nutritional quality. We believe it is important to highlight these novel research accomplishments for a broader audience with the hope that our readers will ultimately adopt these powerful technologies for crops improvement in order to meet the demands of an expanding world population.

Bread Wheat Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, 2002. Wheat is the most widely grown cereal crop in the world with an ever increasing demand. It plays a fundamental role in food security and a major challenge is to meet the additional requirements with new cultivars and improved cropping technologies. This book covers information from a number of international experts on the current status of research on wheat improvement and production, wheat breeding programs and genetics as well as on other aspects including wheat diseases from its evolutionary origins to seed production technologies from the FAO website.

Wheat Improvement, Management and Utilization Ruth Wanyera, James Owuoche, 2017-05-24. The Wheat Improvement Management and Utilization book covers some of the most recent research areas that touch on enhancement of wheat productivity. It is obvious that wheat is one of the major staple crops grown globally This crop has widely been researched on considering that for instance it is afflicted by various abiotic and biotic stresses that limit its growth and productivity Today s goal of wheat improvement consistently is to develop varieties that are high yielding with good processing and technological qualities well adapted and tolerant to prevailing biotic and abiotic stresses Therefore this is a valuable reference book on wheat improvement agronomy and end use qualities particularly for those who work in research organizations and higher academic institutions Moreover it provides an invaluable resource for readers interested in a quick review of trending topics in wheat

Fahima,2013-06-29 This book is about the contribution to evolutionary theory and agricultural technology of one of humankind s most dramatic imitations of the evolutionary process namely crop domestication as exemplified by the progenitor of wheat Triticum dicoccoides This species is a major model organism and it has been studied at the Institute of Evolution University of Haifa since 1979 The domestication by humans of wild plants to cultivated ones during the last ten millennia is one of the best demonstrations of evolution It is a process that has been condensed in time and advanced by artificial rather than natural selection Plant and animal domestication revolutionized human cultural evolution and is the major factor underlying human civilization A post Pleistocene global rise in temperature following the ice age i e climatic environmental factors may have induced the expansion of economically important thermophilous plants and in turn promoted complex foraging and plant cultivation. The shift from foraging to steady production led to an incipient agriculture varying in time in various parts of the world. In the Levant, agriculture developed out of an intensive specialized exploitation of plants and animals. Natufian sedentism followed by rapid population growth and resource stress induced by the expanding desert coupled with available grinding technology may have triggered plant domestication. CIMMYT Report on Wheat Improvement, 1978
